Genesis 1 | Daily Dose of Hebrew

Proponents of the dependent-clause translation argue that according to the grammar of the Hebrew, Genesis 1:1 should be understood as a type of substantival clause.² In both English and Hebrew, a substantival clause is an entire clause that functions like a noun. For instance, in the sentence, "I know you are watching me," the clause "you are watching me" is functioning as a direct object of the main verb "know," a function usually reserved for nouns and pronouns.

The "Spirit of God" hovering over the waters in some translations of Genesis 1:2 comes from the Hebrew phrase ruach elohim, which has alternately been interpreted as a "great wind". Victor P. Hamilton decides, somewhat tentatively, for "spirit of God", but dismisses any suggestion that this can be identified with the Holy Spirit of Christian theology . [13]

Genesis 1:2 - Wikipedia

Genesis 1:1 is widely taken as the authority for the Judeo-Christian doctrine of creation out of nothing (creation ex nihilo), but most biblical scholars agree that on strictly linguistic and exegetical grounds this is not the preferred option and is not found directly in Genesis nor in the entire Hebrew Bible.

Genesis 1 - The Israel Bible

In this series of posts we're addressing the question as to whether there is a gap between Genesis 1:1 and 1:2 (or 1:2 and 1:3). You can read more about the implications of this in the first post of this series. In this post I'm looking at the plausibility of a gap in the text by looking closely at the Hebrew grammar.
